What is Globalization?

Globalization is the increasing the interdependence of the world's cultures, marketing strategies, and populations to provide the cross-broader trade in goods and services including technology, business, society, and many more. Many countries created their investment to participate with their partners to work on their personal goals for more than a hundred years.

Globalization I - The Upside: Crash Course World History #41

The three reasons that the global trade and economic interdependence increased dramatically in 10 years are multinational corporations engage in global reach to boost power, traveling to send that are easier, and protective, low tariffs and regulations on international trade that could lead to free trade. The least expensive phase that could lead to extensive is shipping, printing, and retail.

The computer that a person participates in the crash course provides a good example of the industrial revolution in the 1960s which is the probability manufactured in China. The corporations seek global markets to extend their profit to compare globally vs. domestically. The corporations and many others do not agree with this situation because they helped America to prevent hatred.

Many Americans use foreign products. The global capital focused on the benefits of the human race is able to access goods in a fraction of the time to support education. The consequences of globalization are improved healthcare and agricultural revolutions. The positive effects of globalization are surviving childbirth and having confidence in your children.

Globalization II - Good or Bad? Crash Course World History #42

Globalization has changed the psychology of the upper-class people living in the industrialized world to celebrate. Most people are working in the service sector: healthcare, retail, education, contraception sex, and the family. The increasing wealth, globalized, consumption, and production affected the environment is more sanitation and losing land. It pops up, extends land brought below cultivation, and cuts down trees.

Economic growth depends on the unsustainable use of the planet's resources. Globalization changed the government to switch the democracy, and political freedom increased. The narrator provides possible positive and negative effects of globalization both currently in the future of humanity to billions that have not benefited from the economic prosperity, addressed the issue to those who are more or less, and learn to solve the problem.
